Sr. Louis, Nov. 25, 1859.

Messrs, Editors:—My remark in my last letter, that my visit to Chicago was attended with the usual storms, needs an explanation, as your readers have no more dea of the weather during my visits to Chicago, than they have of my visits; but to be short, I never arrived at that notoririous city unaccompanied with a storm—therefore, my remark; and to this fact I lay the charge of my dislike to that city, at the same time, I have no idea that the nhabitants there consider my dislikes of their place as amounting to any particular sum. Chicago is notorious for many things; first, its independent way of doing business, and to this fact may be attributed its almost unparalelled success; as I have been informed by many persons enhave been informed by many persons en-gaged in business, that their element of success was their independence; and, no. doubt, some of us from the "Old Domin-ion" might graduate successfully among such a professorship of sharpers. It has many fine building that would do credit even to New York, and large fortunes have een invested in this way, to give cast and character, as well as permanence, to their city, for a few years ago, (I mean in 1856 and 1857) there was an opinion prevalent, that its growth was premature, and would not be sustained by the surrounding country, and had there not been such a concentration of railroad interest there, pouring in such masses of strangers, their city would have been like "Jonah Goard," unable to stand the pressure of a noonday's sun, but it is now a large city, and I pre-sume too large to move, consequently will always be just where it is now, in a "mud hole,"—with their houses on stilts, and their cellars in the garret. Much praise fs due to the authorities, however, for their indomitable perseverance to overcome the disadvantages of a bad location.

all other western cities, and is to-day, the New York of the West in that respect. It was my privilege, while there, to visit celebration in honor of the almost immortal Schiller, the German Poet, whose literary accomplishments stand so high upon the scale of fame, pure, chaste and elevated in sentiment, they are truly worthy of the honor that has been bestowed apon them by an appreciating ancestry -When Schiller rose upon the literary hem-sphere of Germany, there were shining ghts of the first magnitude; yet he so uccessfully competed for honers, his genius entitled him to, he soon found him-self an ally at the brilliant and intellectual Court of the Duke of Saxe Weimar. outburst of his immature genius-gathering his feeling from the surrounding choas. he here presents society to the reader as a whirlpool of disorder, while virtue goes clad in undulations of mourning, his hero Charles Moore, carries into this very disorder the magnanimity of a Brutus, and the graceful deportment of a Grandison; but even in this strange charicature of the real action of life, has genious displayed itself with so much power as to fix upon him the guze of public attention, and make him a conspicuous character. He found himself gradually ripening into an independent flow of thought, and transplanted himself from the Military Institute into the literary circle of the Court of Weinar, where he found a competitor already littering with the beautiful cornscations f genius, in the no less renowned poet than Goethe; but he soon brought forth those splendid creations of historical tra-gedy which have been regarded by his countrymen, and nearly all of the literary world of Europe, as among the best productions of modern art; for in them the loftiest and purest characters of different ages and countries, contrast the place of the ruffians and robbers in his first production. Affecting catastrophies, noble sentiment, revolting horrors, the purity of liberty, the superiority of loveliness, and the brilliancy of wit, seemed alike the creation of his fancy; and he soon found himself cotemporary with his rival Goethe. His flow of thought was as inspiring as it was lofty, and he flings the masterpiece of his characters, the beautiful and high minded Maid of Orleans, with her standard of liberty unfurled to an oppressed people, with so much force, that the armics of Germany pay reverence at the shrine of her humble dwelling as they pass by its deserted walls. And though he ingers at the fountain of human inspirations, he yet embelishes before our gaze the perfection of character as though idealized by direct inspiration from above.

The Streak of Lightning.

The Doctor, thus fervently appealed to, laid down his hand at euchre, pushed his spectacles up to his forehead, gave his half empty tumbler an intense look, and gratified our curiosity as to the origin of the street of the street last street. cant phrase "Boys, did you see that streak of lightning?"

You must know, my dear young friends, that St. Louis was not always as big a place as it now is, and accomodations for man and beast were not so good fifteen or twenty years ago as they are now. "About those days the tayern at which I stopped; and it was the principle one in the town, contained one room, like the cabin of a steamboat, which served in the various capacties of a bar-room, a hall of justice, a common council room, a theater, and, when the town was full, for a sleeping apartment for such of the surplus population as were not lucky enough to get accommodations in a more limited space.

"Well, business once carried me there in mid-summer, and, as the town was thronged, I was put with thirty or forty others, in the great accommodation room, and consigned for the night to my pallet of straw. I came in late that night, for I had met some ac-quaintances, and we had made rather fast time of it, so that I found all the matresses occupied, save the one reserved for me, and each occupant fast asleep. The landlord had given me a small piece of candle, about an inch long, to light me to bed, and as he was too sleepy or too lazy to get me a candlestick, I took the tallow in my hand and marched up to my dormitory. It was a fearfully hot night, and the temperature, of course not much lessened by the heat radiating from the carcasses of thirty or forty sleeping men.

"I soon found my bed, and I forthwith proceeded to "unshuck." Sticking the candle on the edge of my chair, I carefully laid my clothes on the back of it, so as to guard as far as possible against all probability of their contact with the tallow, and I was proceeding to blow out my light, when in my anxiety to save my clothes, the only suit I had with me, the thought occurred that I had better remove the candle altogether. After a glance around the room, I found this to be a matter of some difficulty. I saw that every chair was occupied. I was afraid to set it on the floor, and the fire place was too far off to justify even the remotest hope of my ever regaining my couch, once away from it in the dark. While I was in this quandary sive heat that prevailed, he had thrown off every necessary article of clothing. He was breathing at the same time as hard, and snoring as loud, as if he were determined to extract every possible particle of enjoyment from these musical accomplish-Quietly advancing towards my snoriog Quietly advancing towards my snoring neighbor, I soon found a firm and permanent lodgment for my piece of candle, now considerably reduced, upon a very promition; also every variety of artificial articles known in the World—a large assortment of beautiful & durable nent lodgment for my piece of candle, now considerably reduced, upon a very promi-nent and very exposed portion of my fat friend, and he was so profoundly asleep that I had no difficulty in fixing a fixed FEET, with the Arm and Elbow Attachment: ARTIFICIAL HANDS, thot I had no difficulty in fixing a fixed basis for my burning tallow. As soon as I had, by actual experiment, satisfied myself that my illuminator would, in its upheavings, turn neither to the right nor the left, but would burn steadily where I had set it, I stole back to my bed as quietly as possible, and soon tried to get up a small gamut of extra noise with my nose and throat, but it was no go. Every incipient effort at a snore was sure to terminate in a titter, and so I just lay still, and watched the course of events. I never saw a piece of candle take so much time to burn half an inch. I thought it had the lives of nine cats, but burn on it did, and still snored on my fat neighbor. The light gradually approached the period of its extinguishment; I confess that it was the most exciting moment of my life. At last, to my inexpressible delight I say At last, to my inexpressible delight, I saw the sleeper give a twitch, and then for a moment all was still; then followed a spasmodic action a little more violent; a calm of an instant succeeded, when the candle performed a circuit in the air, expiring as it reached the floor, and the fat man, wide awake and perfectly erect, was heard to exclaim :- "Boys, did you see that streak of lightning? Anybody dead? I'm hit; don't you smell scorched meat!"
